

A Water Food Chain

There are countless food chains involving different plant and animal species in a variety of habitats all around the world. At the base of the food chain lie the producers. Producers are mainly green plants and certain bacteria, which convert sunlight into food energy. Above the producers are the consumers who ingest live plants or other animals. Decomposers, such as, bacteria, molds, and fungi make use of energy stored in already dead plant and animal tissues.

